

My brief comment on CDM for the future:

The CDM seems to be oriented more at industries than activities at civilian level. For example, Renewable Energy, Low Carbon Electricity and Energy Efficiency are listed at the very first part of the list according to the CDM Methodology Booklet and those are more for industries to me. In my opinion, the activities in which more civilians can participate need to be very much preferably encouraged. So, I guess the UN need to look into each project more carefully. The UN needs to actively increase the awareness of the civilians about the Climate Change. Also, just at the beginning of the CDM Methodology Booklet, I was not really sure if the UN is encouraging developed countries to develop developing countries or it is encouraging developing countries to develop environmentally friendly industries through the CDM at the first glance. I hope the UN does later and the UN encourages the developing countries to develop green economy. If the UN doesn't raise the environmentally friendly activities of the developing countries, we cannot succeed in the field of the global environmental protection as a whole.

Tomoyuki Igarashi

January 15, 2012